SURYAN features the ability to provide an alternative to Chrome. This will allow users to use the stable browser while still having the ability to access the more experimental Google Play versions. The beta version is expected to be released sometime in the next few months, and it will be available for users to download on Google Play. SURYAN is powered by Chromium under the hood. This makes it extremely lightweight compared to the other browsers, and many of the bugs that users experienced with Chrome are not present in SURYAN. Users can expect a Safari-like browsing experience with lots of power. SURYAN also features the ability to run on Windows, macOS, and Linux platforms, making it the first commercially available browser with that capability. It is compatible with all Google APIs, meaning that you can make calls to many services that a Google browser can make calls to, and the API will work as if it were a native browser. Redesigned User Interface The overall UI of SURYAN has been redesigned to be more intuitive. Users can expect a much more familiar experience while browsing the web. The new design will make it easier for users to browse in their preferred way. The new design is also focused on the developers, and it makes it easier for them to create new extensions and themes. It will even let you change the look of the browser when installing extensions and themes. Speed SURYAN is powered by Chromium, the same engine that powers Chrome, but SUR
